Question 10

According to Tourism Tasmania, over one third of tourists who come to Tasmania visit at least one national park during their stay. Including local, interstate and international visitors, well over one million people visit Tasmania’s most popular national parks each year. This provides opportunities for many people but can also have the potential to negatively impact upon experiences within these national parks.

Referring to specific user groups and/or stakeholders, describe the potential impact of a high number of visitors to Tasmania’s national parks. Discuss how this can influence human–nature experiences and shape values towards the natural environment. (30 minutes)

- Answer either Question 11 or Question 12.
- It is suggested that you spend approximately 30 minutes on this question.
- Your answer must be written in a carefully constructed extended response (essay form).
- Complete your answer in the space provided on the following pages and write the question number you are answering in the box provided.

Question 11

For many years, Tasmanians have struggled with finding the balance between using the natural environment for commercial profit (e.g., hydroelectricity, mining, forestry, aquaculture, tourism) and developing strategies to enhance and protect these same environments so that people can develop a deeper connection with nature.

Describe the historical and contemporary issues that have influenced values towards the natural environment in Tasmania. As part of your response, describe ways an outdoor leader may facilitate how members of their group reflect on their own values and attitudes towards the natural environment. (30 minutes)

OR

Question 12

When people engage with the natural environment, they bring with them their own unique values, attitudes and cultural perspectives. This includes people with an Aboriginal heritage.

Discuss and describe ways in which outdoor experiences can specifically contribute to our understanding of the way in which many Aboriginal people value the natural environment.
